TUITUM, MANIPUR, 24 MARCH, 1944: The Battle for Imphal had started very well for the Japanese. Catching the Allied forces off guard, the initial attack looked as if it would repeat the victories of 1942, when isolated allied forces retreated in disorder when encircled. Once again the 17th Indian Infantry Division was cut off; this time, however, order prevailed and the division began an orderly retreat back to Imphal, destroying the road behind them. At one point along the Tiddim road, a key height, part of a saddle, overlooked a bridge over which the division was retreating. Initially, the British had lost the ridge, but it was retaken the next day. That night, the Japanese attacked again.

AFTERMATH: For the first time in the campaign, the Japanese were able to bring medium artillery into the battle. However, control was poor in the mountains, and most of the fire was ineffectual. Indian artillery, supplied by air drop, rained freely on the Japanese attack. At one point the Gurkha defenders heard tanks. With no weapons to stop them, the tanks passed down the road unhindered. The Gurkhas held the Japanese attack. The next morning they discovered that the Japanese light tanks had driven into a minefield, destroying 4 of the 5 tanks. The Japanese commander stayed with his tank until attacked the next morning. In a scene soon to become common in Manipur, the commander committed suicide rather than face possible capture.
