The Taiwanese military maintains a high degree of discipline and training, even basic units receiving training from foreign advisors (America, Israel, and South Africa being the primary countries). Alertness is maintained at a high level, prepared for what they believe is an inevitable Chinese invasion.

The best of the yearly intake of recruits ends up in one of the two parachute brigades, where they undergo even more intense training than in the infantry. Though the unarmed training of the average Taiwanese soldier is superior to most armies, many in the parachute brigades go on to advanced martial arts training (martial arts clubs being one of the few recreations most soldiers have access to). Requires Infantry package.

Like most Asian police departments, the Taiwanese police are very polite and respectful until you piss them off, then they beat the crap out of you. In addition to normal police activities they have to contend with a large Triad element (unsure of level of police corruption), and the hunt for Chinese subversive agents (real or imagined). In a Chinese invasion, the police would be expected to act as an urban guerrilla force.

Note: I was unable to find evidence of a dedicated counter-terrorist force, but I would almost guarantee one exists.
